TEMPERATURE

250 °C

Ingredients

8 ud whole quail, spatchcocked

2 cda soy sauce

2 ud sprigs of fresh rosemary

1 ud lemon (juice and zest)

3 cda honey (rosemary or wildflower)

3 cda extra virgin olive oil

2 ud garlic cloves, sliced

1 pizca flaky salt and freshly ground black pepper

Method

1 SPATCHCOCK AND MARINATE

With kitchen shears, cut down both sides of each quail's backbone, remove it and flatten the bird by pressing on the breast. Pat dry and rub with the oil, garlic, lemon zest, salt and pepper. Marinate 20-30 minutes at room temperature while you light the kamado.

2 MAKE THE GLAZE

In a small pan warm the honey with the soy, lemon juice and the chopped leaves of one rosemary sprig. Bring to a gentle simmer for 1-2 minutes until slightly syrupy, then set aside. It should be pourable but with body, ready to brush.

3 FIRE UP THE KAMADO

Set up the kamado for direct cooking, no deflector, and stabilize the dome between 240 and 260 °C. Fit the cast-iron grate and let it heat for a few minutes until properly hot; oil it lightly just before grilling.

4 GRILL SKIN-SIDE DOWN

Lay the flattened quail skin-side down and grill 4-5 minutes, until the skin is marked and the fat renders. If fat triggers a flare-up, slide the bird to a cooler spot for a few seconds. Flip them once the skin is golden and crisp.

5 FLIP AND GLAZE

Flip them and brush the glaze over the skin. Repeat every 30-40 seconds in thin coats over the last 2-3 minutes, letting each layer caramelize before the next. Pull them when the breast reads 74 °C or the juices run clear; 12-15 minutes total.

6 REST AND SERVE

Rest the quail 3-4 minutes on a warm board so the juices settle. Brush a final coat of glaze, scatter a few fresh rosemary leaves and flaky salt, and serve with lemon wedges. Best eaten with your hands.

Editor's tips

- Honey sugar scorches fast: glaze only at the end and, if it darkens too much, move the bird to a cooler spot for a few seconds.
- Pat the skin very dry before grilling and rub with a thread of oil: moisture is the enemy of crisp skin.
- These are tiny birds that overcook in a flash. Use an instant-read thermometer or touch and pull them at 72-74 °C in the breast: carryover heat does the rest.
